Chance: A Conversation

Dennis Haskell¹
University of Western Australia

Chance, I know that my chances of having a conversation with you are slight, at the very best, I know it’s no use taking exception to your presence, but what on earth are you doing in this life? Your place seems so arbitrary; and if we could sit down together I know the talk would be hopelessly haphazard, since love could lead swiftly to gardens to garbage, a line of poetry might read “kohl adrift more she role ti dah.”
There are those sure your heart belongs to dada but you know its heart belongs to you.
So around the world we’d go on a marvellous, maddening, richly frustrating excursion in which go is only occasionally distinguishable from woe.
Some think you are not the ultimate in godliness, which you find a glorious test;
you who know no meaning know meaning best.
Only when we get to death, in which you see you have a role, we part company.
You say, “In the end that’s the subject which is for you, but is not for me.”
The Gift

Small clouds flock outside the window like phlegm in the sky’s throat that we fly into, hoarser and hoarser, the engines coughing above cut outs of paddy fields, deep olive green plantations intersected by water, and dry strips of land, where men and women work: nature is being put in its place. Lower and lower until we are being whispered about by destiny, or chance. We hang dangling at speed, in fragile air; but today luck chooses us, the headlines will escape our names, we will enter the miraculous serenity of procedures, of routines, all our fear buckled up in a gift of banality, of schedules that even we will quickly forget; then the rumble and crack of wheels on the ground, hooked by gravity and weighty again. The most valuable elements of our lives are hardly noticed. Now the sun’s gleaming off the wings and we’re heading homeward in the light at last unperturbed by its luminous and utterly ordinary silence.

1Dennis Haskell is Professor of English and Cultural Studies and Co-editor of the magazine Westerly at the University of Western Australia. He is the author of 17 books, including 5 volumes of poetry. His most recent collection, All the Time in the World (Salt Publishing, Cambridge, UK, 2006) won the WA Premier’s Prize, and he is currently working on a critical anthology of contemporary poetry and prose from Southeast Asia.

© Copyright 2007 Asiatic, ISSN 1985-3106
http://asiatric.iium.edu.my http://asiatric.iiu.edu.my International Islamic University Malaysia (IIUM)